MERRIE MELODIES

"Will you come to my house for Thanksgiving dinner, Bugs?" Petunia Pig asked Bugs Bunny a few days before the holiday. "Porky and Cicero and Beaky Buzzard are coming, too."

"Sure, I'll come," Bugs accepted the invitation with enthusiasm. "And I'll tell you what I'll do, Petunia! I'll bring the turkey."

"Oh, no," Petunia objected. "That's too much for you to do, Bugs. Turkeys cost an awful lot of money."

"Don't worry about that." Bugs waved one long arm airily. "Besides, I'm not goin' to buy an' ol' tame turkey at the store. I'm goin' to hunt a wild one in the woods.

"Oh, Bugs, that would be wonderful!" Petunia clapped her hands happily. Then her face clouded. "Are you sure you can get a wild one?" she asked doubtfully.

"IF Bugs g-gets it," Porky grinned.

"Don't you worry about that," Bugs said with cocky assurance. "I'll get it, all right. Now I'll go get my huntin' stuff ready! S'long." With a wave of his hand, Bugs sauntered away down the street.

"I'll bet he won't get any wild turkey," Cicero said, looking after Bugs's vanishing figure.

"Nope. He shore won't." Beaky shook his head. "It takes a REAL hunter to shoot a wild bird!"

"You boys are just jealous of Bugs," Petunia scolded. "You wait till Thanksgiving and you'll see."

Bright and early the next morning Bugs started forth on his hunting trip. He had borrowed his Uncle Jack Rabbit's ancient blunderbuss and equally ancient hunting cap. On and on he went, skipping, hopping, jumping, and peering into the underbrush with his bright eyes.

Suddenly he heard a sound far off among the trees. "Gobble, gobble, gobble!"

Bugs stopped in his tracks. "A wild turkey!" he breathed. "Close, too." He dropped flat on the ground, clutching the blunderbuss, waiting and watching.

Behind a clump of bushes, Beaky and Cicero shook with laughter.

"Gobble, gobble, gobble!" Beaky crooked again in a life-like imitation of a wild turkey.

Beaky and the chuckling Cicero watched the excited Bugs grip his blunderbuss firmly and slide forward toward the sound.

Beaky and Cicero moved onward, too, creeping silently and unseen through the thick underbrush. With

BUGS BUNNY'S THANKSGIVING TURKEY

Beaky's "Gobble-gobbles" they led Bugs through scratchy bushes and briers, through mud puddles and thickets. Soon poor Bugs was covered with burrs and mud.

"I can't go back now!" he groaned. "I've gotta get that dratted turkey. The kids'll never stop laughin', if I don't bring one back!"

At last, even Cicero and Beaky grew tired, too. "Bugs is almost worn out," Cicero reported, peeking through the bushes. "We'd better get our last stunt ready now, before he gives up an' goes home."

So they uncoiled the long rope they were carrying. They made a loop in one end and put it carefully on the path, hiding it with leaves. They swung the other end over a strong tree branch above the path.

"Now we'll climb up on the branch and hide," Cicero giggled. "When ol' Bugs comes along, he'll step in the loop. Then we'll pull the rope an' jerk him up in the air."

And behind them, Bugs was plodding wearily down the woodland path.

Cicero and Beaky were on the tree branch, out of sight among the leaves, when scuffling footsteps told them that Bugs was approaching. They waited, tense and silent. Then there was a pull on the rope. Quickly the two plotters yanked their end of the rope, pulling it up and over the branch. The job was done! They rocked with laughter.

But Bugs was not dangling in the air. At that very moment, he was standing in the path, staring with unbelieving eyes at the sight before him. There, in the air above the path, swung a big, fat, wild turkey, its feet caught in the loop of a rope.

His weariness left him. He whooped with joy as he pulled out his hunting knife and cut down the loudly gobbling bird. Then, with his prize over his shoulder, he turned gaily toward home.

Silently, Cicero and Beaky looked down through the leaves and watched. Their mouths were open with bewildered amazement.

"We didn't catch Bugs, after all!" Cicero gasped when Bugs and the turkey were gone.

"Nope. We shore didn't."

A few days later, at Petunia's Thanksgiving dinner, Bugs and the magnificent, golden-brown turkey held the center of the stage.

"I told you I'd get him," Bugs said, pointing proudly to the huge bird on the silver platter. "It was a fight, I'll tell ya. I tracked that pesky turkey fer miles, through the woods, into swamps, up an' down a few hills and even across a river! At last, I saw him. He musta been five hundred yards away. I lifted my gun. I took careful aim. I fired. An' down dropped this king o' turkeys. Ol' B. Bunny never fails!"

Cicero and Beaky sat and listened silently. They didn't say one single word.
